The following are two initial exercises I use to teach patients how to engage their glute MED and MAX effectively. They take a lot of brain power (remember the post about neuromuscular connections), but they are low-load and easy to do without fancy equipment. Because they are non-weight bearing, they set the patient up for success to learn the muscle-movement connection without worrying about ...

There are certain messages that serve to get you "back to one" when you find you're going off course. Whether you use tools such as a manifesto, a personal mission statement, a vision board or a list similar to Benjamin Franklin's "13 Virtues", taking the time to identify with one and then keeping it handy is worthwhile "and perhaps even imperative.

Management 3.0 is dedicated to changing the culture of work. One way to do that is by identifying both your core values or "who you are" as a team, as well as the wish values or "who you want to be" as a team. Here is a series of exercises I've cobbled together that hopefully can help you identify, develop and nurture your team's values.
